No question, they did this.” Let me be clear: this is not really a question, or an opinion. But first, a statement: this is not a question about the conduct or behavior of the officers on the ground at the scene of the incident. It is not a question about whether the police should have discharged the flash-bang grenade in this situation. It is a question about whether Officer Wilson's account of his conduct in this incident is believable. In the wake of a tragedy like this, the calls for answers and accountability are crucial. Ask HN: How to create a hybrid website? - arohan I want to create a CMS website. My final aim is to deliver the website in three different clients: (1) desktop, (2) mobile and (3) web app. I've heard of basic static hosting, but it won't work for me. I also want to avoid custom development. Can you suggest what tools/platforms I can use to create this hybrid website. ===== itsjustme1 I would suggest creating a single html page with various sections, by using canvas/svg for the images, and that you use with css to make it look and function like a normal desktop website. That page would have the following sections: * header * footer * left side (desktop only) * main page (desktop only) * right side (mobile only) * content * a blank page/image for mobile (only) You could then use css/css media queries to hide the things that would not work on a mobile. *Note: you will have to create a mobile version of header and footer as well as the blank image for mobile. If you can figure out how to detect a mobile browser on your own, or if you can use CSS media queries to hide things, that would be even better. I have not used canvas/svg extensively but i do believe it can be done. ----- akg_67 Not sure what kind of embedded/embedded hybrid website you are building, but I would go with liquid templating software, such as the open source Disqus/Jekyll/Hugo for flexible templating, where you can organize content into sections, like header, footer, left side, main content,
