Hypertrophic cardiomyopathy, possibly complicated by arrhythmias and sudden death, is a frequent (30-80%) finding in patients with systemic sclerosis. We evaluated 123 patients with the disease and 97 normal controls of similar age and sex by cardiac catheterization to determine whether scleroderma is associated with hypertension, coronary artery disease, left ventricular hypertrophy, or overt left ventricular dysfunction. The left ventricular systolic pressure and left ventricular end-diastolic pressure were higher in the scleroder

In the present study of 35 insulin-dependent diabetic patients, we found no difference in antibody levels against type 1 (A, B, C, and E) and type 2 (amino acid 839-842 epitope) human glutamic acid decarboxylase islet cell antigens between those with diabetic nephropathy and those without. However, the latter patients had significantly higher levels of anti-GAD antibodies of the IgM and IgG isotype than those without nephropathy, while these IgM and IgG isotype antibodies did not differ between the two groups. The higher concentration of IgM antibodies suggests that these antibodies may be mainly derived from B cells, and the higher concentration of IgG antibodies and the presence of IgG isotype antibodies suggest that both B and T cell-derived antibodies may be involved in the pathogenesis of diabetic nephropathy. A new study suggests that some people with hypertension can normalize their blood pressure simply by eating more almonds. Almonds have long been associated with a reduced risk

Homeobox Homeobox or homeobox genes are DNA-encoded genes that are primarily responsible for the development and patterning of an organism. These genes encode transcription factors, e.g. the paired class genes in Drosophila. Homeobox genes tend to have a highly conserved DNA sequence that encodes a protein domain called the homeodomain. The homeobox class of genes was first discovered by developmental geneticist Bruce Ames at the State University of Iowa. Discovery Homeobox genes were discovered and named by Bruce Ames at the State University of Iowa. By studying the behavior of homeobox genes in Drosophila melanogaster, Ames found that they were linked to homeotic changes. Homeotic transformation, meaning that the genes cause a change in the normal form of a body part such as the segmental identity of the fly eye or wing, was among the most significant breakthroughs in the evolutionary history of animals. Evolutionary significance During the 1970s, it was discovered that homeobox genes were one of the first genes to be linked to the progress of evolution. In one study, it was discovered that the homeobox and zic genes were present in the genomes of phyla that are distant from each other (500 million years between zebrafish and human), yet because the homeobox genes kept the same arrangement of DNA sequence and structure, they were thought to have come from a common ancestor. In Drosophila melanogaster, the homeobox genes located near to the genes that mark the pattern of the fly body plan, the Hox gene clusters. Drosophila have four homeobox genes arranged in two gene clusters.

The first is called Antennapedia (ANTP), which is responsible for the segmentation of the fly. The second is called Bithorax (BX) and this gene's pattern also appears with the rest of the fly body; the antiphase posterior (AP) set of segments. The Antennapedia and Bithorax homeobox clusters are large, complex clusters of non-coding DNA, also called "junk DNA." Although most of the DNA within the clusters is non-coding, the segments that are marked by these homeobox genes are also non-coding. Through this, a definite developmental pattern for the segments is established, allowing the fly to have a well-defined body plan.
